Methylation of the c-MYC promoter in primary bladder tumours. The c-MYC proto-oncogene is a key regulator of cell proliferation and cellular growth control. It also appears to have a major role in the pathogenesis of several types of human cancer, and c-MYC expression has been shown to be associated with the degree of malignancy of bladder tumours. Methylation of c-MYC promoter CpG islands has been described in other cancer types but it has not yet been investigated in bladder cancer. This study investigated the methylation status of the c-MYC promoter in primary bladder tumours in a cohort of 118 patients. The methylation status of 8 CpG sites was investigated using methylation-specific polymerase chain reaction and correlated with clinical and pathological parameters. Methylation of at least one CpG site in the c-MYC promoter was detected in 45 (39%) of the tumours. A significant difference in frequency of methylation was observed between the 2 groups of tumours: bladder tumours with (15/16, 94%) and without (27/90, 31%; $p = 0.002$) gross muscle invasion. No other significant correlation between c-MYC methylation and clinical or pathological parameters was observed. To our knowledge, this is the first study investigating methylation of the c-MYC promoter in bladder cancer. We found that c-MYC methylation was associated with higher incidence of muscle invasion, which supports a role for the c-MYC gene in the pathogenesis of muscle invasive bladder tumours. I just want to say that I love this blog. The topic is very interesting and very relevant. I really like all the insightful thoughts and comments which you provide for us. It gives us a nice idea. This is really a great blog. Thanks for sharing such nice information. I think that this website really has something great. I just added your blog in my favorites list! Keep up the good work. Very easy to read, clear and concise. I know this website offers quality based content and articles. "How may I can acquire more viewers?" That is the goal of all webmasters. More and more people are visiting this web and also
