But on Monday, Nikki Haley, the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, warned Iran and the Trump administration not to start a war. "This is not about diplomacy," Haley told reporters at an unrelated news conference. "This is about preventing Iran from ever getting a nuclear weapon. We're not going to let Iran have a nuclear weapon." "Those who would want war with the United States and the rest of the world are in no position to talk," Haley said. "And as the person in this administration who has been dealing with the situation, I just speak for myself when I say we would be cautious about starting a war with Iran." Trump tweeted on Sunday that the U.S. would "totally obliterate" Iran, suggesting that this is what he would do to Syria if President Bashar Assad were to use chemical weapons. Haley said that the U.S. would not follow through on this threat, though she did not rule out future military action against the Assad regime. "There are lots of things that are possible," she said. "I think that the military solution hasn't worked in the Middle East in recent years. We have to find a political solution." "That is one of the reasons why it is important for the international community to convene at the U.N.," she added. "We cannot have a solution that is only guaranteed to happen in the Middle East." Haley criticized Syrian President Bashar Assad for allegedly using chemical weapons on his own people, saying the world is "not
